said that the international arena's BRICS authority is based on a growing economic power within its member countries. Along with its natural resources and a share of the world population, it is a driving force within the global economy. However, the most intrinsic process of establishing BRICS took place only just before the Munich Security Conference.

Putin delivered a speech at the Munich Security Conference on February 10, 2007, underscoring Russia's focus on southern world countries in emerging international relations. And Putin stated that Russia wanted to maintain an independent foreign policy to ensure international relations. Before that incident, he intensified meetings with China, India, and Brazil and made them take political form within the BRIC group. At the same time, at the Munich Conference on Security Policy, Putin (2007)[15] said that the rising power nations' economic potential increased so that the political influence would increase. It would convert into a democratic world order.

On September 20, 2006, Putin called for a ministerial meeting of the group members at the sidelines of the 61st United Nations General Assembly meeting in New York. In the session, all the foreign ministers of China, Brazil, Russia, and India's defense minister met and expressed a desire to expand multilateral cooperation under the BRICS platform (BRICS Information Organization 2015).[16] In 2007, at the 62nd UN General Assembly meeting in New York, met all the BRIC members' foreign ministers. After that, several meetings took place before the first summit was held. BRIC state heads met on July 9, 2008, at the G-7 Toyako-Onsen, Hokkaido summit, Japan. In the meeting, all the leaders agreed to have a complete discussion of BRIC countries in 2009. Again, on Russia's initiative, all foreign ministers of group members met at Yekaterinburg on May 16, 2008. After the meeting, they issued a joint communiqué reflecting common stances on topical global development issues (Ministry of the Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China 2015).[17]

Later, Russia, Brazil, China, and India met at the same Yekaterinburg meeting in 2009 and issued a summit declaration as part of their global governance objectives. At the first BRIC summit held at Yekaterinburg on June 16, 2009, Russian President Dmitry Medvedev stated that BRICS would become an epicenter of world politics (Medvedev 2009).[18] From then, Russia has stuck to the BRICS group through thick and thin. Furthermore, during the 2009 BRIC Summit, Medvedev opined as below: