removing dollars from the international trade transactions very soon. The World Bank (2010) report states that Russia's per capita income is higher than other countries. According to the news, it was USD 19,840 in 2010, whereas China's was USD 3586, Brazil's was USD 10,700, South Africa's was USD 7536, and India's was USD 3586 (2010 World Bank Reports).[24] Likewise, in 2015, Russia's per capita income was USD 23,790, South Africa's was USD 12,830, China's was USD 14,160, Brazil's was USD 15,020, and India's was USD 6020 (World Bank 2015).[25] That implies Russia is the wealthiest country within the BRICS group. The BRICS Joint Statistical Publication (2020) says that by 2019, Brazil's per capita income increased to the US $8754, Russia's is to the US $11,584, India's is to the US $2045, China's is to the US $10,276, and South Africa's is to the US $5979. It indicates that Russia is the wealthiest country in the BRICS group.

BRICS and Russian Global Economic Strategies

The establishment of BRICS resulted from the global economic recession during 2008–2009. Scholar Isachenko (2012) has underlined how BRICS membership can help Russia's financial strategy in the long-term period. These areas are mentioned below:

- It would pave the way for improving access to foreign markets;
- BRICS membership creates greater transparency in trade policy;
- It would give space for the use of an effective dispute-resolution mechanism, and
- It can create an avenue for participation in multilateral trade negotiations and an opportunity to influence their decisions.

The 2013 ‘Concept of Participation by the Russian Federation in BRICS’[26] underscored that BRICS would help Russia create a more favorable environment for promoting mutual trade to encourage the Russian Federation export and the development and investment cooperation with BRICS members. The forum can help strengthen collaboration with BRICS states in international organizations, thus jointly promoting their global trade interests.

Furthermore, in international trade with BRICS countries, Russia consistently increased its growth over some time. The west-imposed
