(a) To provide a favorable international environment for developing and reforming the BRICS countries' economies and financial systems, all member countries' standard approaches must be equitable, stable, and practical (ibid.).[33]

(b) The group countries must be committed to the rule of law in world affairs and progressively expand the foreign policy cooperation with BRICS members in the interests of security and peace, with due respect for sovereignty, territorial integrity, and non-interference in the internal affairs of other nations.

(c) As a member of BRICS, Russia should enhance its foreign policy's multi-vector character, thus strengthening its international positions.

(d) Russia must develop privileged bilateral relations with BRICS countries to use the advantages emanating from cooperation opportunities fully (ibid.).[34]

BRICS provides Russia a platform to upgrade bilateral ties into a multilateral level with other group countries. Thus, Russia believes that cooperation within groups on specific issues must not replace the established bilateral relations among members.

- Considering the contradictory and still emerging character of reasons influencing the development of the BRICS group is one of the Russian foreign policy's objectives, to facilitate in every possible way the centripetal trends in the group and neutralize negative factors (ibid.).[35]
- Russia considers that with a strong political will of group countries to deepen cooperation, the association can become crucial to new global governance. It was particularly so in the financial and economic areas in the initial period. Also, Russia favors positioning BRICS in the world system as a new world affairs model, overarching the old dividing lines between the East and West and North and South (ibid.).[36]

Furthermore, scholars like Leonid Ivashov (2014) stated that for Moscow, the geopolitical rise of BRICS is in the process that helps Russia maintain its international stature and preserve its statehood and territorial integrity. Therefore, the success of the BRICS group is significant for