That implies that China's growth rate surpassed the US and Japan's growth rate.

The critical issue here I am trying to draw is that with the 2008 economic crisis, the international political economy structure loopholes have been exposed and made us rethink its developmental model in conjunction with the relatively robust Chinese economy. Further, China called for an alternative global governance model from time to time. In 2008, China hosted 43 nations at its Asia-Europe meeting. The then-premier Hu Jintao emphasized that China would act with a ‘sense of responsibility while handling the global economic recession’ (Lloyd 2008).

In 2009, on January 29, Wen Jiabao,[10] the then premier of China, attended the World Economic Forum (WEF)[11] and explicitly expressed the global financial architecture's shortfalls. He lashed out at the existing institutional finance structure of the world economy. And he stated that the global financial crisis of 2008 had fully exposed several deficiencies in the system. As China views, the existing international system is unequal, undemocratic, and unjust. That is how China's engagement with the global economic governance system was strictly based on a realpolitik calculation of national interest. Further, Jiabao pointed out how China will emphasize achieving a ‘win–win’ multilateral solution to solve global problems.

Later, China's Vice Foreign Minister Fu Ying, 2010, on October 16, at the ‘Third World Policy Conference,’ Marrakech, stated that China was considered the world's second-best economy after the United States, sometimes calling it E2 as well. However, Global Times, one of China's popular newspapers, conducted a survey that said China was still a developing country despite its second-best economic status.[12] Meanwhile, Beijing took the initiative to guide African Union countries to share the responsibility for Libya and ensure that any damage to its sovereign and territorial integrity was unacceptable, as it would affect all the A.U. countries
