(Volodin 2011). With this ‘shared responsibility’ phenomenon in global affairs, China has collaborated with international south countries.

Though the US economy is still going strong, in another 20 years, the Chinese economy will surpass it and become number one in the global economy. Though mainly the global south, the international community desperately wanted China to lead them politically, economically, and in security affairs at the global fora. This was because China had already implemented economic reforms (Xuetong 2006). Since China was growing impressively, it wanted alternative markets other than the West for fast growth and economic influence. Apart from that, other countries like India, Brazil, and Russia, like countries, kept pushing for reforming the existing world order. But it has been dodged. Therefore, China tried to lead the Global South country's interests in global fora. Sometimes even influential personnel openly asked China to show the global south interests and requirements. For example, in 2004, United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan remarked in a speech at the Chinese Tsinghua University that rich countries assume high responsibility levels. China still considers itself a developing country, which is understandable because it is the fastest developing country globally, even at that stage. And its high rate of success will lead to a greater responsibility toward poorer countries. In this way, China got a higher geopolitical status, and its share of responsibility in world security began to mushroom (Yan and Jiang 2004).

During the first decade of the twenty-first century, several groups like the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) and many others were created. However, the BRIC can play the most significant political, economic, and economic role in global affairs due to its immense resources. Thus, it was the natural choice for China to move toward the BRICS group. The BRIC acronym was first created by Goldman Sachs economist Jim O’Neill in 2001 while projecting these countries’ growth rates. He foresaw these countries to have the potential to overtake other developed countries. O’Neill argued that the West should shift its economic policies toward the BRIC countries region, as they would have safety for advanced countries’ investments (O’Neill 2001). However, President Putin was the first to propel this group into a political group and coordinate the group to work toward a more democratic world order with the multipolarity concept in international relations (Akulov 2012). The first Summit was held in Yekaterinburg, Russia, in 2009 (Mielniczuk 2013). South Africa became an official member of BRICS during the Sanya Summit (Yan 2011). Every Summit took place