with a specific theme and stressed the prevailing global problems and cavities in the international system. Apart from that, China needs markets to grow its economy; thus, China's natural result is to embark with BRICS in global affairs. Apart from that, in the years between 2020 and 2050 China's growth can be divided into two stages because the 2035 target set by the 19th CPC Congress aimed to achieve a moderately advanced country by the middle of the twenty-first century, 15 years ahead of schedule. Further, by 2035, China's GDP will be about $30 trillion, 25 percent of the total world GDP. Then, between 2035 and 2050, China's economic growth will be approximately 25–40 of the entire world GDP. Thus, China can lead East Asia to grow into a region as powerful as North America and Europe (Wei 2017). Likewise, in February 2017, Pricewaterhouse Coopers (PwC) released a report called The World in 2050. It says that the world economy will grow 130 percent between 2016 and 2050, in which China's share will be 20 percent, and it will become the number one country in the world. The emerging market economies would grow around twice as fast as advanced economies. It predicted that the order of the world's ten largest economies could be China, India, the United States, Indonesia, Brazil, Russia, Mexico, Japan, Germany, and United Kingdom. That implies the future belongs to India besides emerging market economies (PwC 2017). However, the emerging markets have to build their infrastructure and institutional developments, which could only be possible. Primarily, various reports projected that China would become the number one economy in the global economy. However, China has some limitations also. The IMF said that China's long-term achievements would depend on how China handles its internal challenges. China might face an aging population because the total fertility rate has declined to 1.7 per woman. An aging population will have social and economic issues. Likewise, China faces an underdeveloped financial system, insufficient innovation, and reliance on carbon-based energy resources. More importantly, China's economic and trade relations with external actors (Dollar et al. 2021).

Therefore, China needs trustworthy allies and like-minded nations with whom China can walk along. In this path, the BRICS will be a great group, and all of the BRICS also have the same ambition to become a significant power in international relations. Thus China would like to walk along with the BRICS group.
