varying sustainability degrees. All four countries combine foreign exchange reserves that exceed US $3 trillion, equivalent to over 40 percent of the world's total cost. It makes them the essential players in the international financial system.

- Instead of simply accepting the ‘Washington Consensus,’ all BRICS countries independently chose their development model based on their national traditions and requirements instead of merely taking the ‘Washington Consensus.’
- BRICS countries hope to establish a more equitable, just, and reasonable international economic and political order.
- BRICS countries want a peaceful international environment, promote democratization and equality in world affairs, and disagree with the old Cold War mentality and confrontational policies.
- One of the most significant aspects of the BRICS group is that despite their different social systems and ideologies, they share a common strategic goal of constructing a more democratic and just, multipolar world. The U.N. plays a central role.

Furthermore, another Chinese scholar Li Mingjiang (2011),[19] underscored the reasons for China's positive attitude toward BRICS and stressed three more aspects, which are:

- All BRICS countries are solid economic powers in the world. Indeed, before South Africa joined in, the group's combined contribution to the global population was 42 percent; it was 14.6 percent of the global GDP and 12.8 percent of the global trade. They also held a considerable amount of international foreign reserves.
- China believes that coming together in one group called BRICS was possible due to common positions and interests in world affairs, mainly economics.
- According to China, BRICS can serve as a powerful proxy to push for the reforms of global institutions.

Again, when the BRICS Sanya (China) Summit took place in 2011 on April 14, Hu put forward four points to bring about peace and tranquility in twenty-first century humanity for shared prosperity. They are mentioned below:

- Maintaining world peace and stability