- Promoting the joint development of all the countries in the international system
- Strengthening international exchanges and cooperation, and
- Bolstering the BRICS partnership for joint development.[20]

Hu Jintao's Work report to the 18th Communist Party Congress Party on November 17, 2012, stated that[21]: 'China will actively participate in multilateral affairs, and support the United Nations, the G-20, the SCO, BRICS, and other multilateral organizations in playing an active role in international affairs, and work to make the international order and system more just and equitable.' As reflected in Jintao's speech, China's initiative and participation in BRICS have been significant and unprecedented (Soto 2012). Furthermore, at the New Delhi BRICS Summit, on March 29, 2012, the then China's President Hu Jintao delivered a speech,[22] where he said that:

> BRICS cooperation now stands at a new starting point, and we should seek ways to build on past achievements and take the BRICS cooperation to a new level through pioneering efforts.

Furthermore, Jintao put forward four proposals on further strengthening the BRICS cooperation. They are:

- Joint development and promotion of shared prosperity
- Equal consultation and deepening political mutual trust
- Adherence to pragmatic cooperation, and consolidation basis for collaboration, and
- Adhering to international cooperation and promotion of world development.

The scholar Hu Angang (2012) of Tsinghua University said that if China implements its long-term goal of becoming number one globally, the US-led Western hegemonic domination of the global political economy will deteriorate. According to Hu's forecast, China will become number one in the global economy by 2030. He also said that by the year 2030, China would complete its transition from a moderately well-off society to a society of shared prosperity, thus paving the way for China to become an economic superpower, an innovation-based state, and a 'green country.' The forecast he made as mentioned below (Table 4.5).
