between the south countries to fight against extreme hunger and poverty. Since 1990, China has successfully lifted 138 million population out of chronic hunger and reached the World Food Summit Goal. China became the Millennium Development Goal of halving the prevalence of hunger ahead of the 2015 deadline. The then Vice Premier of China, who attended the meeting during this agreement, said that China is the leading agricultural producer among the developing countries. China is ready to cooperate with the FAO because it will benefit agricultural development and progress toward hunger reduction targets among poorer people. It is said that since the FAO and South-South cooperation initiative was established in 1996, China has been a front-runner in sharing its agricultural expertise around the world and deployed 1023 experts and technicians to 25 countries by 2015. This collaboration encouraged China to establish a South-South Cooperation Trust Fund with a US $30 million initial contributions in 2008 (Emirates News Agency 2015). That shows how China is trying to enhance the Global South's advancement in international relations. Most of the time, it is shouldering the global south. Chinese foreign minister Wang Yi observed that BRICS is not limited to the BRICS group only. It goes beyond the borders of the five countries. Therefore, China intends to broaden the concept of the BRICS and make it more flexible for other EMDCs to consult, coordinate, and cooperate with the BRICS. Thus it would strengthen the BRICS globally and promote South-South cooperation in international relations[25] Likewise, while addressing the 2020 virtual BRICS summit, Xi Jinping remarked that the key emerging economies uphold multilateralism and oppose unilateral sanctions and long-term jurisdiction in an unprecedented crisis. And he underscored the point that all BRICS countries are going under the same umbrella. He pointed out that we must focus more on our direction when the wind is strong and the high tides (Xie 2020).
