not the only time China has proposed four points, though. Scholar Srikant Kondapalli and Priyanka Pandith (2016) views Chinese policymakers, intellectuals, and non-state actors as meticulously articulating Chinese foreign policy toward the BRICS group because the global power structure has continuously changed. Therefore, Beijing is grabbing the opportunity and expanding its foreign policy wherever possible. Apart from that, power equations with the United States have been regularly reordered. Hence, China is ambitiously aiming for a significant place in emerging international relations. And trying to find and seek common ground, united front tactics to counterbalance.[33] Likewise, Scholar Sakshi Anand (2016: 204) argues that the China and Russian cooperation is significant here because Russia's support is critical for achieving the target of the China's One Belt, One Road. Apart from that, China intends to build a troika alliance by including India in the China partnership. In the process, China and Russia will be at the core level, and Brazil and South Africa will be at the periphery level".[34]

While signing documents for BRICS to make Shanghai its headquarters on February 26, 2016, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi said that the New Development Bank would serve for more significant development and connectivity of all its BRICS countries. The bank aimed at funding infrastructure and sustainable development projects. Yi emphasized that China must work with all group members for the economic and political cooperation of BRICS. While commenting on the downward trend in BRICS, he cleared that it was not only BRICS countries but also the whole world affected by the economic recession. Wang concluded that the group is poised to grow and enhance its role in international political and economic affairs (Huaxia 2016).[35] Thus, China seeks to neither overturn the existing world order nor completely adhere to its status quo. The Chinese ambassador has opined this to the United States, Cui Tiankai (2016), where he said:

> You cannot say that the rules set up half a century ago can be applied without any change today. But what we want is not revolution. We stand for the necessary reform of the international system. But we have no intention of overthrowing it or setting up an entirely new one. (Tiankai 2016)[36]

Scholar Chen Zhimin (2016: 781) says that China's main intention is to go for outside reform to create plurilateral parallel orders supported by new
