institutions outside the existing international order created by like-minded states, of which the NDB is an example. By joining and establishing it, China would provide financial assistance for its big infrastructural projects that it has been announced. That is how China is trying to change the existing international economic order. China has the tools to restructure global economic governance. However, it is supportive of the BRICS. Because Xi Jinping and the PRC have the intention to promote collaborative and benign multilateralism to reduce the regional threat perceptions to China while enhancing its geostrategic influence with the BRICS group. Thus, China believes that BRICS can fulfill the aims of the Chinese foreign policy (Katada et al. 2017: 424). Further, China wants to change the BRICS policy. Beijing is trying to combine the BRICS and the BRI and become a leader in both. The Belt and Road Portal says that BRICS synergy with the BRI; thus, China is willing to share its development benefits with the other BRICS members and developing countries (Belt and Road Portal 2017). However, it is against the spirit of its foreign policy for India. And India since the starting of the BRI, India has been against it. Therefore, there is a possibility of a gulf between India and China. That's the BRICS has to look into it. That China's BRICS membership has some reasons and some purposes. The BRICS role will be crucial for China as the situation seems critical between the East and West. China has an arduous task to convince other group countries to make BRICS Plus from BRICS. Apart from that, China is getting space in the global economy due to Covid-19 expanding its economy. For that, BRICS would be the ideal avenue as the BRICS has scores of resources in their kitties in several forms. Hence BRICS is still relevant in China's foreign policy. With China's political and economic change in global politics, China can use the BRICS to enhance South-South cooperation and South-North economic integration (Wang et al. 2021). As the father of the BRIC's term, Jim O'Neill (2021) says that although China's economy will grow slowly, it will overtake the US economy. Nevertheless, it will be possible with the help of BRICS group members and others as the relations between the West and China are critical. However, the crucial point depends on how China handles the situation and how other BRICS react.
