China rose from isolation to become a global player, which has taken place over a brief period. China became active in membership in international institutions like the IMF, World Bank, and many others, leading to a spiraling FDI into its economy. China leveraged multilateral organizations' role to become an economic giant in global affairs, rivaling the United States. It is estimated that it will surpass US growth in the coming years. China's global governance approach is managed and found on Chinese interests and responds to the international system's loopholes.

Though China was not that rigorously interested in BRICS, the emergence of BRICS has given China another avenue to diversify its interaction with other major emerging economies like India, Brazil, and South Africa and prominent global player Russia. With the BRICS group, China can lessen the trade imbalance it has faced in the recent past. At the same time, China must not be aggressive with the BRICS members on policy matters and bilateral relations because it will again backfire on its foreign policy. Finally, the BRICS membership allows China to reform the democratic-deficit global governance system, as it maintains cordial relations with the BRICS member countries.
