along the border. During the meeting, Zemin met Yeltsin. Both leaders declared that the Russia–China alliance must let go of the past and embark upon a new road to build trust and cooperate on overall development. It was to seek cooperation strategically and respect each other's sovereignty. Both leaders stressed creating a peaceful, equitable, just, and democratic world order based on multipolarity (Ministry of Foreign Affairs of People's Republic of China 1997). It was being done to counter the Western hegemonic domination in international relations, thinking that the West is seriously causing instability in their affairs and international relations. Later, both countries called to preserve the 1997 Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) between the United States and the former Soviet Union. The Russia–China alliance lifted the UN Security Council sanctions against Saddam Hussein's Iraq regime (Cohen 2001).

However, with changing times, the relationship between Russia and China has been increasing. The two become global partners to reform an existing undemocratic international order, stressing democratic equations. According to China's foreign ministry, the two countries have very close relations. In 2013, the two presidents met five times during meetings, had three telephone conversations, and exchanged messages over 16 times, pushing their relationship to a new level that no other country could measure.[1] Russia and China firmly support each other on sovereignty, security, territorial integrity, and other core benefits. China supports Russia in its fight against terrorism, safeguarding Russian freedom and security. Likewise, Russia continually supports China's principles and position on the Taiwan issue, Tibet and Xinjiang's related frictions, and other matters at the regional and global levels (ibid.).

Furthermore, during a visit to Russia in 2013, on March 23 at the Moscow State University, the Chinese President Xi Jinping said that the Russia–China relationship is one of the best in present-day world affairs. The high and robust-performance relationship between the two countries serves the interests of both countries. It provides a prominent safeguard to maintaining an international strategic balance and peace and stability in world affairs. These days, the Russia–China cooperation has gained momentum rapidly, strengthening from economic to political and even security domains. The growing Russian and Chinese axis provides more opportunities and temptations to its neighboring and distant states, resulting in the rapid institutional development of certain entities like BRICS and G-