20 (Kortunov 2015). Thus, a gradual emergence of bipolarity emerged, with traditional divisions of ‘us’ and ‘them,’ global ‘good’ and international ‘evil,’ all of which reflect on the Cold War environment (ibid.). Like Russia, China was always discontent and suspicious of the Western world’s domination of international affairs and its double standards on human rights, a market economy, accountability, democracy, transparency, and law rule. China has provided its version of global governance and harmonious living (Wang and Rosenau 2009). So, on these issues, Russia–China is cooperating, unlike earlier, which is causing concern in the Western world. Both countries try to emphasize other southern world countries’ importance in their external policymaking. In the process, both Russia and China are heeding southern world countries’ concerns to reform the existing global order. They also think that there should be democratic representation in global governance.

Russia–China Views on Global Governance

Global governance is less permanently established, fluid, and continuously constructed and reconstructed. The global governance mechanism consists of international organizations, including the United Nations and the slew of inter-governmental organizations at the regional level (Wang and French 2013). Scholar Trenin (2012) said that Russia and China have similar views on global governance. However, that does not mean that there are no differences, but cooperation is greater. In Russia, the concept of global governance is relatively new. Nearly ten years ago, the first time a researcher from St. Petersburg, Natalia Shveikina, published a state of domestic debate about global governance. However, it remained a puzzle regarding defining global governance in Russia. More importantly, there were no Russian scholars who wrote about global governance. The present researchers believe that global governance is a hierarchical system controlled from above or outside the system (Kulik and Yurgens 2016). According to Russian scholar’s practical knowledge of global governance, Russia intended to bring change since it is a hierarchical system. For that, BRICS is the primary tool to push forward for reforming the global governance system. Scholars Kulik and Yurgens (2016) observed that Russia is considered a partner of China. Both the countries trying to counterbalance to the United States led the Western world to get an
