effective global governance system. After the Cold War, the Chinese foreign policymakers proposed a just and rational international political and economic order and called for multipolar world order. However, Chinese policymakers were clueless about how to define it. Since there was more exposure to the outside world, Chinese foreign policy was primarily constructed around domestic and economic development and social stability. Though Chinese leaders propagated the global order's institutional structure reform, the seeds came out for this sort of tendency when China became part of the WTO.

In China, the Chinese scholar Wang Yizhou (1995) first used the phrase' global governance' in a conference to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the United Nations. It was held at La Trobe University in Melbourne, Australia. Yizhou gave the impression that the UN would become the center of global governance, probably in peacekeeping and peace-building, to create a sense of preventive diplomacy.[2] Later, the concept of a 'harmonious world' was first officially referred to in a joint declaration on China and Russia in October 2004, where the basic principles of the statements are mentioned below:

- Mutual Respect
- Common Development
- Confidence Building, and
- Cultural Tolerance[3]

In April 2005, the Chinese premier Hu Jintao mentioned this concept at the Asia–Africa conference in Jakarta. But the watershed moment occurred when Hu delivered a speech at the celebration of the 60th anniversary of the United Nations, at an event called 'Strive to establish a Harmonious World of Lasting Peace.' The Chinese government reiterated and elaborated this concept in its White Paper in December 2005 (Wang and Rosenau 2009). It elaborated on the four principles of such a harmonious world.

International Politics Democratization: All countries have equitable rights to participate in international affairs and must be consulted on common international problems, not be dominated through institutions controlled by the West. Thus, they must seek to fix the democratic deficit in global institutions (Sun and Yu 2004; Wang and Rosenau 2009). That is why the Global South countries are joining together to surface their voice