on international fora so that the Global South could firmly demand a democratic world order.

Justice and Prosperity: China believes that globalization considerably widened the disparity between North and South. International trade, global capital flow, and the information revolution helped the developed world disproportionately. China argues that the increasing economic inequality between the rich and the developing countries is unjust; however, it can undermine world affairs, peace, and stability. So China called for shared development and prosperity among different countries (Wang and Rosenau 2009). Hence, China increased its aid to the Global South for a prosperous Global South. However, many critics of China's belief is that China uses coercive methods in aiding the Global South. Therefore, the debate is on China's aiding policy in international relations.

Diversity and Tolerance: China believes that globalization was a double-edged sword and brought high economic interdependence levels with cultural imperialism. Thus, China believes that countries have different histories, cultural experiences, and economic conditions and that nobody must impose one's values and models in other countries. It can make the world a better and stable place (Wang and Rosenau 2009; Hu 2005; Keping 2007). However, in practice, there is a lot of gap in Chinese foreign policy.

Peaceful Resolution of Global Conflicts: This has been part of China's foreign policy objective since 1953. The then Chinese premier Zhou Enlai had included five principles of Chinese foreign policy (Hongying and Rosenau 2009).

These principles were frequently featured in the news, referring to their ethics as an evolution of new security dynamics within international relations. The media has continued to cover the phenomena as a 'new security concept,' a 'common security,' or 'collective security and 'confidence-building while describing China's new approach to international security. China believes that every country has its approach to world affairs but will collectively tackle global security problems (Liu and Wang 2006). Thus, they have never accepted the existing structure of international order. According to China, the current global order has several loopholes, including the dominance of power politics, the growing disparity between the north and south, intolerance of different values, use of force to solve international conflicts, and neglect of the environment. China, therefore, seeks to reform the global governance system.
