China knows that they have benefited from that status quo for 30 years. The greatest ever socio-economic transformation happened under the US-led world order, which China got from it. Another essential aspect that Lo stressed was Putin envisaging a multipolar world order that is tripolar. Here Russia, the United States, and China believe that the United States is the only competitor in the present scenario.

Further, China does not want to confront the United States because it has more benefits with the United States than with Russia. The Russian Federation intends to reform its excellent power status ambition again through BRICS but has not regained its earlier status for over twenty years. On the other hand, through the BRICS, China can counter its widespread perception of a 'China Threat' to neighbors and other countries (Senguin 2015; Lo 2016). China wants to change the existing international system; however, it is not aggressive. Instead, it is doing so in a way to reform. That's the reason why China established multilateral cooperation with many neighbors and other countries. China still believes in South-South collaboration and North–South dialogue. In a nutshell, China's BRICS engagement is the new mechanism of its twenty-first-century diplomacy and the result of China's international responsibility and consciousness and its reflection of the reality of China's economic strength (Yue 2013). In this context, Scholar Zhao Minghao (2015) said that,

> The Chinese government is now going further, urging the rest of BRICS to institutionalize their cooperation, not just pursue domestic reform. China contends that a stronger BRICS grouping would help safeguard all developing countries' interests. To that end, the country is also spearheading the effort to reform the global economic architecture, including pushing its reforms to the International Monetary Fund's weighted voting system. (Minghao 2015)

The BRICS existence and cohesion depend on how well China and Russia coordinate at the BRICS forum. Russia wants to make BRICS a geopolitical entity, as it often reflects upon states and their representatives, whereas for China, the BRICS is just another group to keep Russia happy. When there is a crisis, China will not let go of its Western alliances. Yet for China, BRICS is essential, but that does not mean that it will directly