total contribution was 98,321 personnel. With this explanation, the BRICS share of UN Peacekeeping forces is greater than the rest of the countries.

The table says that the BRICS countries have a more considerable contribution within the UN Peacekeeping Forces, whereas the Western countries' contribution is deteriorating day by day. It is true that the US security association in the region surrounding the BRICS is only bilateral and that it lacks a robust collaborative security institution. Further, neither NATO nor the Organization for Security has been present around the BRICS countries region. Cooperation in the European countries is also too deeply dependent within the United States itself and does not have much support from the BRICS region security. So, for a collaborative security engagement with Asia, the United States needs to encourage a much higher degree of multilateral military cooperation with its prominent Asian partners like Japan and South Korea (Binnendijk 2016). Furthermore, Russia and China have already cleared their stand on the reform of the Security Council. These two countries are now mulling over supporting other BRICS members as Security Council members and being vehemently vocal on any global issue.

The position paper of the People's Republic China at the 71st session of the United Nations General Assembly 2016, held on November 16, said that China supports the reform of the Security Council to fulfill its complete responsibilities, which were all prescribed in the Charter United Nations. The reform's primary objective would be to represent developing nations in the Security Council. At present, China contributes 2600 UN Peacekeeping Forces at the ten operations. China is also the most significant troop contributor and the second-largest fund contributor to the UN peacekeeping missions, among the five most prominent members of the Security Council. On paper, China's president pledged that China would play an active role in the UN for maintaining global peace and stability.[5] The other reason for stressing more on BRICS securitization is because Russia–China is increasing its defense budget over the recent past.

American Led West Crackdown on Russia–China

Realists have always emphasized how the international system's power transition has led to military conflict among states. In this context, the Asia–Pacific region is not an exception to this game. For instance, scholars like
