John J. Mearsheimer (2001) stated that rising power nations like China have rarely been satisfied with the existing system and seek to create a regional or global hegemony. Though some scholars do not accept this assumption, the geopolitical changes cause concern. Thomas J. Christensen (1999) said that East Asia would be at the helm of a security dilemma, the reason behind this being that it will for long be characterized by significant shifts in the balance of power or by an unequal distribution of economic and political power within the region and between countries, and a relatively low level of intra-regional economic interdependence, or also by an anemic security institutionalization in the area.

In 2011, the then US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, in the article ('America's Pacific Century') of Foreign Policy Journal, wrote that 'the future of world politics will be decided in Asia; it is not in Afghanistan or Iraq, and the U.S. will be right at the center of this action.' However, China rebuked this immediately in the People's Daily, saying that the Asia Pacific Region belongs to all its people. It is not acceptable that the United States uses the term 'diplomacy' as if its phenomena were to be seen outside the area. Even if it is the 'Pacific Century,' it would be the 'Pacific Century' of all of 'Asia' (Oqanesyn 2011). The United States is seeking other countries' assistance in the region (South Korea, Japan, Australia, and the Philippines, and, if possible India), to establish a military-political bloc to counter the China–Russia sway in the region. As it is already clear, the US-led Western presence in the Asia Pacific region has increased rapidly since 2011.

Later, to intensify the cooperation in November 2011, the United States announced a joint multilateral trade agreement with Australia, New Zealand, Malaysia, Brunei, Singapore, Vietnam, Chile, and Peru to create a preferential trade regime in the Asia Pacific Region. The project was named 'Trans-Pacific Partnership.' However, America withdrew from this agreement under the Trump regime later. With these nations, the trade agreement reached US$171 billion in 2011 (Sushentsov 2012). The US military presence increased in the Asia Pacific region since Obama came into power in 2009. In 2012 and 2013, the United States officially announced that 60 percent of its naval vessels and 60 percent of its air force would be installed around the Asia Pacific region by 2020 (China Daily, November 25, 2016). But, China is also increasing its military budget over a period of time, on March 4, 2012, China announced that it was going to increase its defense budget by 11.2 percent to make it US$106 billion, and
