also according to the informal sources, China is mulling on the increase to $200 billion very soon (Sushentsov 2012). The SIPRI 2020 report says that total military expenditure rose to US$1981 in 2020. It is an increase of 2.6 percent in real terms from 2019. The five biggest spenders United States, China, India, Russia, and the United Kingdom, accounted for 62 percent of global military expenditure. The more interesting facet of the report is that China's military spending grew for the 26th consecutive year. It is estimated that China has spent US$252 billion in 2020, representing an increase of 1.9 percent over 2019 and 76 percent over the decade 2011–2020. Likewise, Russia's military expenditure increased by 2.5 percent in 2020 to reach US$61.7 billion. However, there is a slight shortfall in Russia's military spending from its military budget compared to previous years (SIPRI 2021).

- This program aims to bolster the capacity of the Chinese armed forces.
- The Chinese government has increased funding for programs related to nuclear weapons development and ballistic and cruise missiles (Sushentsov 2012).

The United States in 2015 lambasted Russia in its 'The National Strategy of the United States of America, 2015,' where, in a document, they clearly stated that Russia was recurrently demonstrating that it did not respect its neighbor's sovereignty and that Russia was ready to use force to achieve its ambitions. In the recent past, Russia's military actions increased and undermined regional security dynamics directly and through proxy forces. Russia had violated scores of agreements that it had signed earlier in the process. Most of the treaties in Russia were signed based on international norms, which included the UN Charter, the Helsinki Accords,[6] the Russia-NATO Founding Act,[7] the Budapest Memorandum,[8] and the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty.[9]

Russia targeted China in the document; the document also said that the United States had supported China's rise in the recent past. China's actions
