in the Asia Pacific were causing troubles in the region. The document said that China claimed a large part of the South China Sea region. Despite cooperation from international actors, China was responding aggressively. And the record clearly stated that China's actions made the United States install military forces in vital international sea lanes of the South China Sea (ibid.). Simultaneously, the document mentioned that no state was threatening US security but that the United States still wanted to engage itself in military-to-military contact with Russia and China while maintaining a close relationship with them on a common interest (ibid.). Thus, it could be seen through this document that attempts were being made to suppress Russia and the BRICS and thwart Russia's intention in creating the BRICS group in the first place.

In this context, Russia and China have intensified their cooperation in the recent past. It has been reflected in their regular and official meetings. The frequency of the discussions between the two countries' representatives has been growing day by day. Both presidents met five times in 2014; later, other state representatives of both countries have met and discussed both countries' security and strategic affairs. In 2013, between August 14 and 16, China's State Councilor Yang Jiechi paid a visit to Russia and held a ninth meeting of the Russia–China strategic security consultation with Russia's Federal Security Council Secretary Nikolai Patrushev, and also met with Russian President Vladimir Putin, including the Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov (Ministry of Affairs of People's Republic of China 2015). Again, between October 29 and 31, Chinese General Xu Qiliang, the Vice-Chairman of the Chinese Central Military Council, went to Russia and co-chaired the 18th meeting of the Russia–China inter-governmental Joint Commission on military technology, with Russia's defense minister Sergei Shoigu.

Later, Chinese vice Premier Wang Yang from November 20 to 23, attended the closing ceremony of the 'Year of Chinese Tourism' in Russia and met with Deputy Prime Minister of the Russian Federation Olga Golodets (ibid.). If we closely observe the meetings, most exchanges hold security and strategic aspects. Both countries realized the importance of cooperation and consultation, considering the threat from Western powers around the Asia–Pacific region. To repeat the same in 2014, both countries intensified their collaboration. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China website mentioned (in 2015) that from January
