that had characteristics of ‘Pax Americana and Sovietica.’ Wohlforth (1999) remarked that even the nineteenth-century Victorian period was not just ‘Pax Britannica,’ but from 1815 to 1853, it was ‘Pax Britannica et Russia.’ From 1853 to 1871, there was no concept of ‘pax.’ Between 1871 and 1914, it was ‘Pax Britannica et Germanica.’ In other words, several states were powerful and balanced each other out and vied for retaining and expanding their colonies.

Since the beginning of the twenty-first century, the structure of the international system has been continuously changing with multiple dimensions. The current world is highly interconnected. There are various sources of interaction between states, businesses, and people. In such a scenario, a single actor cannot achieve the long-term goals of sustainable economic development and make it the winner of global politics because diverse resources and competencies play a crucial role in becoming a global actor. That is the way countries will go for a collaborative mood with other like-minded states to enhance their position in international relations collectively.

Regionalization and Decentralization

A severe political clash between the Eastern bloc (led by USSR) and the Western bloc (led by the United States) created a bipolar world order in a post-Cold War atmosphere. The ‘Bipolar System,’ also emerging out of two ideological extremities defined by these two polar power centers, was a phenomenon based on what is known as a ‘Eurocentric’ vision (Waltz 1993). During this phase, the global south solidarity emerged with the evolution of the Non-Alignment Movement. After decolonization and solidarity groupings like the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM), the rise of the global south led to a contestation through independent positions. Because of this, the military role has been depleted despite the peak of the bipolar interpretation of the world. This Cold War of ideology partially ended only with the disintegration of the Soviet Union in 1991. The end of the bipolar system of international relations started transiting toward a new approach in world affairs. The drive to retain Western hegemony continued as well. It has also led to the rise of the regionalization of global politics.

With a growing localization and regionalism in international politics from 1991 onwards, functional theorists like David Mitrany and K. Deutsch
