‘the death of BRICS’ by lessening the importance of BRICS in present global politics (Wright 2015). Also, on January 28, 2016, Financial Times wrote, ‘BRICS is dead, long live Ticks’ (Steve 2016), and on October 24, 2016, Mint wrote, ‘BRICS: Falling apart’ (Sidhu 2016). The below-drawn table says much about how the Western media have covered BRICS affairs from 2013 to 2014 (Fig. 5.1).

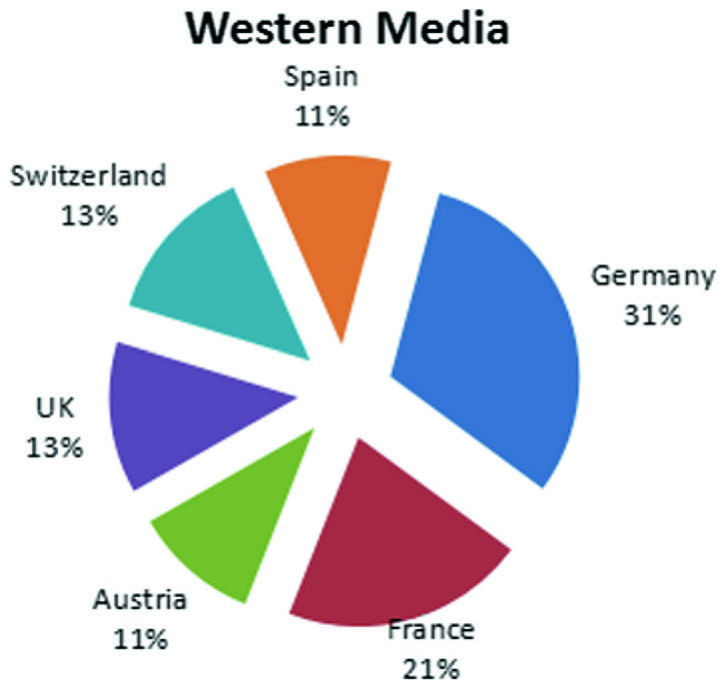

Fig. 5.1 Number of Materials in the Western press, by country, 2013–2014 (Source Marakhovsky [2015], ‘BRICS in the Western Media’, pg. 137)

The figure displays the totality in which the Western media published coverage related to international relations. BRICS had a prominent position; however, it was mainly with a negative range. Germany published 31 percent; in fact, it is the country to publish the maximum international relations in the West. The second place is France, which has 21 percent, Austria has 11 percent, the United Kingdom has 13 percent, Switzerland 13 percent, and Spain 11 percent. That means the West is aware of BRICS activities and is cautiously observing its international relations steps. With this, we can analyze how much interest the West had in focusing on the BRICS group member countries and how it gives less importance to BRICS, except for those few countries like Germany.

However, with the available data, it was clear that BRICS was being projected negatively for its role. This implies that the West was trying to