lessen the importance of BRICS in world affairs. Furthermore, when BRICS New Development Bank was established, the West paid a lot of attention. For example, Stefan Wagstyl, on March 23, 2013, in Financial Times, wrote saying, 'imagine few different courtiers building a holiday house, but are unable to agree on how much it would cost them.' This was another attempt at showing the initiative of these countries down. Again, Kenneth Rapoza, on March 26, 2013, in Forbes Magazine, wrote that 'despite a plethora of Western scholars' opinions that BRICS is an anti-American group and can challenge the United States in future world affairs, I believe it is just a political and economic opportunities coordination group.'

Immediately on March 27, 2013, in the Financial Times, Gideon Rachman pointed out that each of the BRICS countries is a bit of an anomaly. The group has lumped together very different states. Again, The Globe and Mail journalist Geoffrey York on March 24, 2014, stated in a critical tone that 'when the entire western world was ready to accept sanctions imposed on Russia over its role on the Crimean crisis, BRICS was not in a mood to get them soon.'

To counter all this negative propaganda, BRICS on December 2, 2015, during the BRICS media summit, a declaration was released by all the BRICS members outlining six initiatives for media cooperation among BRICS members. They are liaison office, establishing a BRICS media foundation, BRICS Journalism Awards, Joint Photo Exhibitions, Training and Exchanges for BRICS Journalists, and joint media coverage of events (Larouche 2015). While reasoning out its establishment, Director General of Rossiya Segodina International Information Agency Dmitry Kiselev (2015) insufficient media cooperation among BRICS members led to the negative projection of BRICS by the third party, so we wanted to change it, and we did it (ibid.). But, then the frequent presence of BRICS material continues. However, it is a negative way only. The West is trying its best to undermine the role of BRICS in global affairs so that other countries give less importance to it.

Future Prospects

On October 28, 2014, Vladimir Davydov, director of the Academy of Social Science, Institute of Latin America, said that the current situation signaled
