to strengthen and contribute to the socio-economic development of BRICS countries and other developing countries (Felbein 2016).

Since the beginning of the Syrian crisis, Russia and Iran have kept protecting themselves from the imposition of a US-led Western military action. It was a unipolar conspiracy to impose military action, and it was a multipolar world's coordinated action that was saving Syria so far (Korybko 2016). That's the reason why China and Russia are still standing shoulder to shoulder with the Syrian president and protecting him from having his regime overthrown. On November 5, 2016, Chinese premier Li Keqiang, while giving an interview to a Russian news agency TASS's first director-general, Mikhail Gusman, stressed that China's cooperation with the Russian Federation plays a significant role in the multilateral cooperation of G-20, APEC BRICS, and other organizations. The collaboration on these formats paved the way for promoting a sustainable recovery of the global economy, improving its economic management, and building an innovation-based, dynamic, interdependent, and inclusive system. Keqiang (2016) further emphasized that members of the UNSC, Russia, and China were making significant efforts to advocate the UN Charter's purposes and principles and the basic rules of international relations. Thus, there will also be a political solution to pressing regional and international issues and promoting a more balanced and fair world order. In the final declaration adopted at the Goa Summit (2016), BRICS countries mentioned that all countries involved would work for a comprehensive and peaceful solution to the conflict, taking into legitimate aspiration the Syrian people through inclusive national dialogue and a Syria-led political process based on the Geneva Communique of June 30, 2012, and in pursuance of the UN Security Council Resolution 2254 and 2268 for full implementation (Druzhinin 2016). This has been reflected many times in BRICS declarations and positions that it has taken together on many global issues. Every BRICS summit comes up with new global problems and makes it one aspect of BRICS discussions. On May 30, 2020, former President of the United States Donald Trump said that the G-7 has become outdated and does not represent changing world affairs dynamics. And he observed that bringing Russia, India, South Korea, and Australia for the 2020 G-7 summit is ideal. However, it triggered resentment among other members of the G-7. However, Russia knows the intention to readmit Russia in G-7. Therefore, it is cautious about its objective and does not want to affect Russia's relations