with other established members for the sake of G-7, where it does not get the deserved respect (Bochkov 2020). Because, for Russia, China became a long-term trustworthy friend and shouldered with Russia when needed. Therefore, Russia will take a calculated step whenever the West destabilizes Russia and China. At the same time, Russia and China should also be mindful that if both the countries attempt to make the BRICS a most prominent geopolitical entity, it may destabilize the BRICS group. Because, for India, it wants to have a bonhomie with the Western countries thus it could get benefitted in international trade and economy.

Conclusion

This chapter dealt with Russia's political shift toward China and its convergence with China on economic and governance issues through BRICS. It discussed how BRICS nations had come together to challenge the Western hegemony, American security frameworks, and the imposition of Western policies and sanctions. Finally, the chapter concludes by looking at how Russia's rising power, China, and the BRICS group have become a matter of fear and alarm for the West, going by the widespread negative coverage in Western media and Western academia. So, as future world powers in international relations, Russia and China's role is now a defining factor in the present global political dimensions. This chapter explained how the two countries had helped each other while taking a stand when the West tried to crack down on them.

The chapter looked at the internal politics within the two nations and the BRICS group members. It examined Russia and China's role over several international crises, be it Libya, Syria, or Ukraine. On the one hand, Russia's stand over Ukraine was a crucial watershed movement within such international politics, especially concerning the rights of legitimate territories. China, on the other hand, took a positive stand, which could often be termed as 'positive neutrality,' where it has attempted to create a rival power for itself to the United States, and at the same time used diplomatic strategies to counter it instead of challenging it. Likewise, China's supremacy became a threat to the West and its BRICS allies, particularly Russia. Yet, when North Korea became aggressive in the recent past over South Korea, and the US installation of its military equipment was based in South Korea, Russia's stand became pro-China. Russia was in