favor of both North Korea and China. However, there are many disagreements between Russia and the West on Libya, Syria, the Iranian nuclear program, post-soviet space, energy cooperation, and several other issues. Nonetheless, given all these internal ups and downs, cooperation between Russia and China has always been in good condition. They have come together to form a strong alliance through BRICS.

The chapter drew a comparison between Russia's approach through BRICS, which attempts to create an alternative institution to the West through a coalition of southern powers. China's approach is more self-driven, where they are mainly associating with BRICS to grow as a new world power in themselves. However, despite such divergences, Russia and China share a common goal. The Russian ambassador to China, Andrey Denisov, on June 20, 2016, stated that Russia and China are two modern independent states and that both countries play a prominent role in present-day world politics. They have their way of thinking and interest in world politics. Russia and China have differing views and many similarities in international politics (Bradshaw 2016).

However, their cooperation will not be disturbed by an iota of challenge in furthering their international relations vision. Particularly, Russia–China relations are strengthening every year despite facing multiple bilateral and multilateral problems these two countries face. Both countries share a common approach to international politics while handling differences diligently. Further, Russia and China started promoting security more strongly, unlike earlier periods. The unprecedented moment of Russia–China relations in the BRICS group is that China has been supporting the security aspects of BRICS to handle since the recent past for Russia's initiative.
