(1957) formulated a theory of ‘integration,’ which they described, would be the basis for regulating normative world politics in the times to come. They argued that:

> An increasing role and influence of international organizations and agencies will ensure stronger international ties and interdependence.

As mentioned above, the states that establish strong relations with other like-minded states also benefit both countries. It has been reflected in post-Cold War period international relations. Prof. Tatiana Shaumyan (2017), Head of the Center for Indian Studies, Institute of Oriental Studies, Russian Academy of Sciences, stated that the process of integration of the world started in the twenty-first century. From then onwards, many countries form regional, inter-regional, and global groups for mutual benefits. They integrate with the world to share their concerns on a common platform for urgent solutions. Therefore, Russia is also participating in the change and accepting the changing trend of world politics.

The best example is the BRICS. The BRICS group countries are considered to be the largest emerging markets in contemporary international relations. The BRICS is gradually taking a geopolitical role that stimulates a global shift in international relations power politics (Sheresheva 2020). Apart from that, southern world countries like China, India, Brazil, and several others have played a significant role in international relations. These countries have been cooperating and taking positions on many global issues. In the process, these countries have been actively cooperating in international relations. With this trend, the world has become more integrated and interconnected. According to Ivanov (2013), the world has shifted toward more interdependence during the last twenty years. In this global integration process, the modern world transformed extensively, and international relations accelerated so rapidly that global culture, societal, scientific, and political developments significantly impacted. Currently, it is possible to say that no country is so strong in the present world that it is more self-sufficient than any other or that it can solve all its problems on its own. The isolationism once practiced by numerous countries is now seen as a dead-end. The consequences of such a non-inclusive approach could lead a nation to stagnation, backwardness, or inevitable decline.

In this context, Russia undertook a mission to initiate and support a multilateral dialogue of cultures, civilizations, and states in international
