The growing relations between Russia and China since the disintegration of the Soviet Union for building a new democratic and polycentric world order have been done through a southern world emphasis. Mainly, it is happening with the help of countries like India, Brazil, Mexico, Indonesia, and South Africa. This has also been catalyzed from within the changed structure of new Russian and Chinese foreign policies. In the process, the two countries have established several regional groups like SCO, BASIC, IBSA, BRICS, etc. Among all the above groups, BRICS has the most prominent position in Russian and Chinese foreign policy objectives. This being the background, the present book titled 'Future of the BRICS, role of Russia and China,' comprehensively discusses the importance of BRICS. The book objective is to study and the Russian and Chinese foreign policy role in present-day world politics concerning BRICS. The BRIC acronym, which was first created by Goldman Sachs economist Jim O'Neill in 2001 while projecting the overtaking growth rate of these countries, consists of 43 percent of the world population, 18 percent of global trade, and 20 percent of the world GDP. BRICS has the potential to overtake the Western world by 2050 in the global economy. Prominent international institutions like World Bank have presented this report, IMF and many other organizations also project the same.
