Given this background, the study has sought answers to the following questions: How do China and Russia individually consider the rise of BRICS as a multilateral entity? What is the primary intention of Russia-China foreign policy to promote BRICS? How would Russia and China counter the Western hegemony in international relations with the BRICS group? What are the main objectives of Russian and Chinese foreign policy in changing world political dynamics? What role have Russia and China played in creating a multipolar world order? Do Russia and China have the capacity and resources to make BRICS a security organization? All the chapters in this study are premised around such themes and seek to probe the relations of Russia and China within the BRICS group. The study acknowledges the Russian and Chinese role in promoting the BRICS in present international relations.

However, recent trends in global politics made BRICS focus on international and regional security issues. BRICS regular meetings also emphatically discussed BRICS's role in global affairs and indicated that in 2016, BRICS countries' national security advisers had met in New Delhi to discuss global and regional security issues. The Russian strategic regions of the post-Soviet space and China's strategic area of Asia–Pacific regions saw an increasing US military force presence on the Russian and Chinese border, creating instability in international politics. Notably, the THAAD placement in South Korea and nuclear missile defense system in Romania and Poland caused deep concern in the relations between Russia-China and the Western world. The biggest question circling international relations scholarship related to BRICS today is its securitization and creating an alternate security agency to the American or Western one. This is because BRICS countries have started cooperating on security affairs recently. BRICS national security advisers meeting in New Delhi, 2016, and its discussion about the security at the regional and international level will indicate its position, particularly about the internet, cyber security, and terrorism. Again, when Indian national security advisor Ajit Doval visited China on July 26, 2017, to attend the BRICS national security advisors meeting, they asserted that BRICS should prioritize security affairs. In the meeting, they underscored the point that terrorism issues becoming a grave threat to global peace, at least within the BRICS countries. Is it an indication of the process of making BRICS a security organization to address the world's pressing challenges of terrorism and climate within the
