this way, states became an integral space. It is understood that states cooperation is the main instrument to ensure political stability, security, economic growth, and social and cultural development (ibid.).

While in earlier political history, control was usually sought through the use of colonial force, such as in Europe, for example, during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries (De Ouro-Preto 2013). Therefore, the time has come for seeing the world in a multidimensional way. Hence, there is the need for a multipolar world order in an increasingly globalized world following the Cold War of the 1980s. It has led to laws being created for closer integration of economies to facilitate the entry of capital and technology (Rozanova 2003). However, not that it had given negative consequences. But, Hirono (2010) argues that globalization has both positive and negative effects. On the one hand, there has been an improved global economic growth and structure, be it industrial, developmental, or transitional. On the other hand, the benefits of globalization have not been universal. Have benefited a few countries and has concentrated capital in the hands of fewer people than ever before.

Notably, unprecedented changes occurred in the global south countries because of globalization. Further, the narrative that has dominated international relations over the years is Realpolitik.[12] There is a greater emphasis on capital and material wealth with the advent of globalization and capitalism in the 1990s. It was also the period that saw the end of the Soviet dissolution when a fierce war on terror began—through counter-insurgency struggles in the early 2000s (Wohlforth 2015). During this period, growth was reflected in economies such as maritime, cyber, and other domains. Some emerging and developing economies like China, India, and others gained and not traditional economies. The emergence of such environments and sub-cultures from the margins of the world's economy led scholars like Fareed Zakaria to term the phenomenon the ‘Rise of the Rest’ (Zakaria 2008). In this instance, by the mid-2000s, China joined approximately 66 international organizations, whereas France joined nearly 92. The United States and the UK joined 77, Russia joined 71, and India joined 61 (Xu and Cai 2007). And yet, traditional scholars claimed that emerging countries did not have adequate strength in the older global institutions. In contrast, new scholars like Srikanth Kondapalli and Priyanka Pandith (2016: 5) argue that emerging economies have merely not been able to put forward a cohesive, comprehensive, and universally acceptable
