Obama's Pivot Asia: Seizing Global Security

Russia and China came together to intensify their strategic cooperation over the period, notably after President Obama issued the 'Pivot Asia'[13] strategy in 2011. After the United State's rebalancing strategy, the United States deployed 360,000 military personnel under the 'Pacific Command' (PACOM). The POCOM positioned 200 ships, including five aircraft carrier strike groups (Aneja 2014). Further, China's 2020 research report on the US military presence in the Asia-Pacific region says that the United States has deployed 375,000 enlisted members of its Indo-Pacific Command, 60 percent of the US Navy ships, 55 percent of its Army, and two-thirds of its Marine Corps. And with 85,000 forward-deployed soldiers and a large amount of high-tech and new weaponry. The report says that the US military has maintained its absolute supremacy in the Asia-Pacific region over the years, considering the growth of China and Russia's military strength (Xuanzun 2020).

Therefore, Russia and China have sought support from other southern world countries like India and Brazil and mulled over establishing a new collective security system and arrangement (Aneja 2014). The best opportunity for them in this regard seemed like it was going to be through BRICS. The question now arises: how can Russia and China cooperate in changing security dynamics in the Asia-Pacific region to compete with the USA's Asia pivot strategy? With whom else can Russia and China focus the most on their worldly affairs? Even if they go along with southern countries focusing on multipolarity, they have ever contending objections on many global and regional issues. At the same time, how would they receive highly competing powers like India, Brazil, Japan, and some other states to play a vital role in global affairs? And how would they promote the group of BRICS as their tool to constrain a Western hegemonic order? And lastly, do they have the intention to make the BRICS group more secure? The book will examine some of these questions.

Rise of BRICS

Each BRICS countries have its own civilizations place and cultural matrix, its view on development and security in international relations. However, all the five BRICS countries cooperate across the old dividing lines: East–
