Similarly, Professor Tatiana Shaumyan (2017), opined that when it comes to the institutionalization of BRICS, it is not sure how Russia can coordinate with other group members. Because India, Brazil, and South Africa, as all these countries, have different opinions on BRICS's global security role. However, scholar Deich (2013) argued that: 'During the past decade, Western countries have been curtailing their participation in the UN peacekeeping/peacemaking operations, with the consequent niche being filled by the rising states, including BRICS, which tends to take the lead in these activities. But,' Aleksandra Sergeeva (2017) and Lena Kutovaya (2017) observed that Russia might not make BRICS a NATO. However, it stresses upon BRICS global security role. BRICS is improving upon its UN peacekeeping measures and reducing Western control daily. Thus, BRICS's next step should be in thinking about how systems in the southern countries could be resolved without any intervention from the Western world. Further, the evolution of the BRICS also caused for promotion of the multipolarity concept in international relations.

Multipolarity: Russian and Chinese Perspectives

Multipolarity was conceptualized in Russia in 1993 (Ambrosio 2007) when the first foreign minister of the new federation, Andrei Kozyrev (1994) said that the twenty-first century would not be going toward 'Pax Americana' but toward multilateralism. Likewise, former Russian president Boris Yeltsin argued (1997):

> We are for a multipolar world… where there is no diktat by any single country. Let the US be one pole, Russia another, Asia, Europe, and several other poles. This is the base for the world to stand on and ensure common security.

There are several reasons why Russia's proposal for a 'multipolar' world order emerged. The expansion of NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization), its consequent isolation of Russia and China, and its attempts to create threat and insecurity were probably the first triggers. But the US attacks on many of Russia's allies, like on Afghanistan and Iraq, besides NATO's war with Yugoslavia, and the overt attempt by the United States to gain clout in the southern region fueled the need for multipolarity further.
