members of the SCO and APEC. Likewise, Brazil is a member of the AU[20] and SADC[21]; India is a member of SAARC[22] and SCO.

Russia cooperated with many states like China, Brazil, and India. So, again, President Putin, at the G-20 meeting on September 6, 2013, in Saint Petersburg, at the sideline meeting, while mentioning the importance of the Eurasian Union, claimed that a multipolar world emerges soon. Thus, Russia's foreign policy principle promotes multipolarity in international relations to benefit from a great power status or superpower status country. However, Russia has been emphasizing China's partnership in its objective, thinking that China historically is more critical of the existing global order than Russia. The frequency of Russia–China state officials is higher than any other country globally.

Later, on January 28, 2014, Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Cheng Guoping and Russian Ambassador to China Andrey Denisov jointly held a press conference. During the meeting, both the leaders stressed that China and Russia should develop strategic cooperation in bilateral cooperation and enhance the interaction in the practical sphere. They must also cooperate in ensuring peace, stability, and the creation of multipolar world order. These countries propelled themselves to establish regional and inter-regional groups to foster their relations. Groups like SCO, BRICS, RIC,[23] and BASIC are prominent and influential groups in present world affairs. But the evolution of BRICS has made the idea of a multipolar world order more engaging due to its growing clout in world affairs.

Russian and Chinese Foreign Policy, a New Vision and Scope

Historically, Russia has had to fight various wars to remain a great power in international relations. Again, right after the Soviet disintegration, Russia's power capability declined substantially. It lost one-sixth of its territory, its economy shrank by around fifty percent, and the state was divided by influential individuals (Wallander 2003; Tsygankov 2010). Three essential security documents of the Russian Federation originated in the 1990s. They are National Security Concept (NSC),[24] Foreign Policy Concept (FPC),[25] and Military Doctrine (MD),[26] which cued that Russia was to emerge as a great power and crucial actor country in the international arena (De Haas
