Country	Military spending of GDP %
	1870–1930	1920–1938
Austria–(Hungary)	3.5	0.9
France	3.7	4.3
Germany	2.3	3.3
Italy	2.8	4.4
Russia (USSR)	3.9	7.1
UK	2.6	3.0
Japan	5.0	5.7
USA	0.7	1.2

Source Eloranta and Harrison (2008), 'War and Disintegration, 1914–1950,' p. 18

Table 2.2 explains how the power centers countries increased their military strength during World War I and II. Between 1870 and 1938, the countries mentioned above were considered a high point in world affairs. It elaborated that Hungary's military budget between 1870 and 1914 was 3.5% of its GDP. However, it got reduced to 0.9 percent between 1920 and 1938. France, between 1870 and 1914 allocated 3.7 percent of its GDP, but this increased to 4.2 percent of its total GDP during 1920–1938. Germany's military budget was 2.6 percent of its GDP during 1870–1914 but increased to 3.3 percent in the second phase. Likewise, the significant period of 1870–1938 saw immense bolstering of military capabilities in these countries.

With the two tables (Tables 2.1 and 2.2), it is clear how the dominant countries held both economic and military control. With this, political influence and Power automatically increased. It proved that powerful nations of their period had the economic, military, political, and cultural resources to be powerful enough within world affairs—not just one. It has been reflected in international politics.

Post-Soviet Era and Rise of the US Hegemony

Following the Soviet dissolution and the breakdown of Russia's global Power, the rivaling US power remained dominant in world affairs, with Japan and West-European countries being seen as secondary. Patrick E. Tyler (1992) noted that the United States drafted a policy statement that foresaw a superpower monopoly. No collection of allies or foes was allowed to rival the United States in the post-Cold War era. Quansheng Zhao (2008) says that after the collapse of the USSR, the world system changed drastically, and the global order shifted from bipolar to unipolar. At that point, such a new dynamic was seen as a threat by many countries. The era of the US-dominated world order emerged; with a monolithic