strategic, political, economic, and technological global policy (Huntington 1999). Countries like Japan, Russia, and other West-European countries had minimal say and influence. This phenomenon in world politics is termed a paradoxical 'Uni-Multipolar' world order by Huntington (1999). Thus, the United States created a regime that maintained, defended, and expanded a liberal economic order to serve US national economic and security interests (Mastanduno 2009). The US security pattern also changed to a certain extent. It had to preserve its importance and defense by focusing on the combination of phenomena like terrorism, rogue-states, and weapons of mass destruction to contain a policy of states that did not concur with US policy. Allies and peer-states like Japan and West Europe were powerful enough but subservient, while the US hegemony worked in exchange for US security (Mastanduno 2009). Hence, global politics became a US show in the last decade of the twentieth century in international relations.

However, with this development, there also was not any fear of threat to US dominance. Some scholars asserted there would not be any threat to US importance as long as it considered other country's interests as interests of second-class states. On top of that, the raw power influence of the United States also had sway. For instance, William Wohlforth (1999) observed that the natural power advantage of the United States means that the second-tier states face incentives to bandwagon with the unipolar Power. But skepticism for the US-imposed unipolar world order sustainability was already growing with the unilateral behavior of the US. Neo-realists like Kenneth N. Waltz (1997) regarded the unipolar global system as the least stable of all structures. Any great concentration of Power threatens other states and could cause a situation where action may be needed to restore a balance in the international system. Later, it also proved that the global political dynamics started changing for many reasons. Because it this time, there was a nascent rise of the Global South countries in international relations as stakeholders of the emerging global order.

Evolution of Global South in International Relations

From the twenty-first century onwards, world politics has been changing with the rise of India, China, Brazil, Indonesia, Mexico, and Turkey. In 2006, the then Chinese Foreign Minister Yang Jiechi at the NAM annual summit remarked that the Global South had emerged on the international stage as a leader of multilateralism. It vigorously advocated global peace, harmony, and joint development and that China had accepted that the rise of developing nations is an irreversible trend in the twenty-first century. Further, the World Bank report on the global economy in 2011 also says that:
