That is how the Global South countries evolve as significant players in international relations. At the same time, the Russian Federation and China started to develop a multipolarity concept in international relations. Through which Russia and China wanted to counter Western hegemony in international relations.

Multipolar World Order, A Conceptual Understanding

The concept of multipolarity exists at multiple levels of interest and centers of Power. The World Bank report of 2011, titled 'Global Development Horizons' says that multipolarity implies more than two growth poles in the world economy, which are measured by the degree of concentration on growth poles. There would be a greater degree of multipolarity (World Bank 2011: xvii). However, it is primarily in a developmental perspective of a region. It will give a different connotation when it comes to political relations perspective. As scholar Herolf (2011) observed that multipolarity is about the distribution of power, in which more than two nation-states have equal amounts of military, political, cultural, and economic sway. Multipolarity is also considered interpolar in the age of interdependence. International scholars emphasized that the rise of a unipolar world would not last for long and that it's an illusion. The multipolar world order is inevitable with the rise of third world countries as global powers (Pape 2005). In this concept, one superpower could co-exist with other major powers. Multiple power centers would play a key role in world affairs. Established powers were challenged explicitly because of their privileged position in global affairs in systematic terms (Hart and Jones 2010). Professor of Law and Head of International Law Chair at Sao Paulo University, Brazil, Paolo Borba, says that the emerging world is more innovative, independent, and an original model of international relations, which is demonstrating respect toward cultural and historical originality in most of the southern world states (Grazini 2012).

On April 28, 2012, Chinese vice-premier Li Keqiang remarked at the famous Moscow State University that world affairs consist of two critical phenomena: globalization and a trend toward a multipolar world order progressing similarly. Scores of forces are forming a new balance of Power. At the same time, developed countries are going through a transformation, and emerging economies are rising. With these changes, no force can form the evolution of world affairs on its own.
