Later, a sudden shift appeared in Russia's approach toward its multipolar strategy when Primakov became foreign minister of the new Russian Federation in January 1996. In 2000, Russia incorporated 'multipolarity' into its foreign policy concept. It says Russia has two things to focus on now: strengthening the international system's political and economic situation and multilateral governance. It would strive to create a multipolar world order (National Security Concept of Russian Federation 2000). Primakov mobilized other like-minded nations to join the strategy, like India, China, and Brazil. India started advocating the multipolar world order in international affairs by accepting Primakov's initiative. For example, on May 29, 2004, the then Congress government included multipolarity and democratic reform of the international order in its 'Common Minimum Program.' It stressed India's opposition to unilateralism in international affairs (Baruah 2004). Thus, India opposed all forms of unilateral decisions in the UN resolutions at regular intervals. As Anuradha Chenoy and Kamal Chenoy (2007) stated, from 1995 to 2005, India opposed the United States in the UN with all 80 percent of its votes.

Likewise, Brazil also emphasized a more democratic representation of international relations and more multipolarity. For instance, Brazil's then foreign minister Celso Amorim on April 25, 2008, at the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro, argued that Brazil's foreign policy works with other nations to create a less static and democratic world order. Furthermore, another Brazil foreign minister (under Dilma Rousseff), Antonio Patriota, at the BRICS Policy Center in May 2011 stated that a multipolar structure of international relations guides Brazil's foreign policy and can be called 'benign multipolarity' or 'inclusive multipolarity.' Here, there is a necessity for participation from emerging economies and developing nations in the international decision-making process (Jesus 2014).

Scholar Cohen (1997) illustrated that Primakov brought a multipolar concept to reduce the US power and made Russia a more influential force in international relations. He also stressed building a Eurasian counterbalance against the US-led NATO by forging closer ties with China and Iran. However, the most important actors in the game were Russia, China, and India. Primakov visited South America to mobilize for this strategy and offered supporting membership in the United Nations Security Council membership. Countries like Russia and China have resisted a hegemonic trend in world politics and wanted to re-construct an international system where they would have a better, if not equal, say. So, the concept of the multipolar system supported by Russian and Chinese foreign policymakers was seen as a viable possibility to bring changes in the existing world order after the Soviet demise. In this context, Russia and China developed the concept of multipolar world order in international relations.
