two phenomenons. BRICS leaders clarified that they are not ‘revisionist’ groups, nor do they want to change the ‘status quo’ of the existing world’s political structure. BRICS asserts that it intends to reform the global order and make it more democratic. Further, Sergunin (2015) observed that this theory ignores the ‘reformist’ states, which define the rising power nations like that of BRICS (Coning et al. 2014; Odgaard 2012)—and a relatively new concept in IR. Some scholars prefer to see such states as ‘pluralist’ or ‘non-aligned.’ The reformist states primarily argue that while they question the existing rules of the game and even try to change them, they are not radically trying to reform them or adapt them to changes during that time. Instead, this creates a provision for accommodating more states in the game and broadening the rubric or canon. Such states prefer bringing changes in the system gradually without challenging others through negotiations and consultations (Sergunin 2015).

This phenomenon has been reflected within the BRICS group in present international relations. That is how BRICS countries behave: like revisionists and status quo states. However, that is not the truth. Instead, the BRICS group is trying to make the existing global order more democratic and representative to reflect the voices of the periphery. Now, it is true that BRICS countries are unhappy with the West’s global geopolitical and geo-economics sphere domination. BRICS member countries do not want to destroy the existing rules that the UN legal and institutional system is based on, but push changes on the global political and economic structure of international relations peacefully, based on the international law framework (Sergunin 2015). BRICS policy statements, summit declarations, and stand on a plethora of global issues, increased the IMF’s quota and established the BRICS development bank for financing the southern world countries infrastructural development, clearly stating that BRICS is not going against the global norms. Instead, by following the existing institutional international standards trying to reform them for more pluralistic. And the BRICS has the potential to do it. For example, scholars Larionova and Shelepov (2021) observed that after analyzing the qualitative and qualitative discourse of the BRICS evolution and its activities, the BRICS is not a challenger to the Western dominated international order and its international monetary system. Instead, it acts cooperatively, seeking to make the international financial architecture and global regulation more representative and responsive to emerging markets and developing economies. Further, the BRICS strengthened international and domestic financial markets (Larionova and Shelepov 2021).

The reformist/emerging countries also believe that non-Western, inclusive institutions can help promote international security cooperation. Particularly in conflict resolution, drug trafficking, non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, combating global terrorism menace, piracy, money laundering, illegal
