Historically, Russia has had to fight several wars to maintain its status as a superpower within international relations. After the Byzantine Empire's fall[1] in the fifteenth century, Russia became the center of Eastern Christianity.[2] Subsequently, Russia fought the Ottoman Empire[3] to defend Orthodox Christians in the Crimean and Balkan wars. Later in Russian history, Russia fought with the United States and Britain to protect its territorial spheres (Tsygankov 2010). Again, right after the Soviet disintegration, the United States had a chance to build a multilateral world order together with other major powers. But it lost this opportunity unwisely. The United States unprecedentedly attempted to remain as the sole superpower in international affairs. The United States began to substitute international law with a law of force and legitimate decisions of the UN Security Council, with directives of the US National Security Council. It also overrode the Organization for security and cooperation in Europe (OSCE)prerogatives with NATO actions, ratifying the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1996.[4] Furthermore, NATO's eastward expansion,[5] the forceful partition of Yugoslavia, the illegal invasion of Iraq, and the blatant disregard for the UN and the OSCE, its arms control issues, and its withdrawal from the ABM Treaty in 2002—all collectively created an environment of a US power monopoly in world affairs. More importantly, the United States treated Russia as an inferior during this period, despite Russia's decision to end the Soviet empire and the Cold War (Arbatov 2014). Therefore, naturally, it had aggravated the relations between the United States and Russia over some time. But, the Russian Federation, after the Soviet disintegration, tried to have good terms with the United States and tilted its foreign policy toward the West. The Russian federation stayed with the West during the Yeltsin period. However, it did not continue for an extended period.

However, the Kremlin foreign Policy structure completely changed with Putin coming into the picture. Russia became more pragmatic, assertive, and active in international relations. Russia's stature also improved gigantically on a global level. As part of rebuilding Russia's power status, Russia started increasingly connecting with the world to reform undemocratic representations within international institutional structures. In the process, Russia began pushing itself to establish new groups and forums. SCO and BRICS emerged as the best examples of organizational groups in this instance.
