Table 3.1 Russian Federation Annual GDP growth rate of 1990–1993

Year	GDP annual growth rate (In %)
1990	−3
1991	−5.047
1992	−14.5
1993	−8.669

Source World Bank data files

With this background, the new Russian federation's Constitution of 1993 clearly stated that ‘reviving the Russian Federation's sovereign statehood and asserting the firmness of its democratic basis of world politics’ (Russian Federation Constitution 1993)[6] was significant. Russia constructed a few doctrines to rebuild the Russian position within international relations. Three essential security documents of the Russian federation originated in the 1990s—National Security Concept (NSC),[7] Foreign Policy Concept (FPC),[8] and the Military Doctrine (MD),[9] which cued that Russia could emerge as a great power and crucial actor country within international arena (Hass 2010).

But Russia was sidelined throughout the last decade of the twentieth century and ignored in international affairs after the Cold War. Without consulting Russian interests, the West also went ahead and divided Yugoslavia. Further, the NATO's eastward expansion continued without any breaks. At this stage, Russian policymakers finally instigated to transform their policy structure significantly.

Independent Russia Since Twenty-First Century

Russia welcomed the twenty-first century with mixed feelings. Their foreign policy slowly shifted toward southern world countries (Trenin 2004). Russia started changing with the accession of Putin into Kremlin. Putin was brought to Kremlin by Yeltsin and made Prime Minister in 1999. In 2000, as President of the new Russian Federation, Putin vowed to rebuild the Russian stature in international relations. And he declared that Russia wants to be a free, prosperous, wealthy, healthy, and civilized country (Putin 2000). For this to realize, Putin indicated that rebuilding Russia was his primary objective and priority through his policies. Putin changed the