

Zaheer's Zone

To ground Zaheer's half of the design narrative, we leaned into an honest, unvarnished material palette that reflects a raw, industrial and distinctly masculine sensibility. We utilised extensive sections of exposed structural concrete. A massive white brick feature wall was engineered to run strategically across different zones. Additionally, his specialised lounge, the Blue Den, carries a deep, moody blue tone that wraps the walls and ceiling, creating an intimate, masculine retreat. This specific colour story does not end at the door; it naturally bleeds into his open-plan master suite, creating a continuous visual thread that makes his private wing feel cohesive and expansive.

Sonakshi's Sanctuary

Step into Sonakshi's private wing and the architectural dialogue shifts from structured geometry to organic, fluid poetry. Her personal suite was envisioned as a tranquil, resort-inspired escape from the frantic pace of the city outside. A space where warmth, softness, and light take centre stage. We replaced sharp corners with soft plaster finishes, sweeping curves and structural arches that gently frame transitions from one section to the next. The palette here relies on rich, organic textures rather than bold colours. Layered linens, soft-washed walls and light-toned oak timber elements interact to diffuse natural light throughout the day.

Fluid Boundaries

To ensure these two opposite design ideologies did not feel like two completely different homes, we utilised sophisticated material interventions to tie the entire residence together. The most prominent gesture is the continuation of heavy stone-clad flooring. We extended the exact same stone tile used on the expansive exterior decks directly into the interior social zones. This effectively blurred the boundary between the inside and the outside, pulling Mumbai's city skyline and sea views deep into the living spaces. Furthermore, we avoided using harsh physical doors or solid partitions to demarcate transitions. Instead, we used a smart shift in underfoot materiality to signal psychological changes in space. For example, moving from the energetic, stone-floored social living zones into the intimate, quiet private quarters is defined by a subtle transition to warm, tactile wooden flooring. This allows the home to function as one seamless, breathable environment where the materials tell the story of connection.

Sa'ada stands as a timeless dialogue between two individuals, translated cleanly into form, material, and light. It proves that when a design is rooted in deep empathy and mutual respect, entirely contrasting worlds can come together to create a harmonious, unified whole.
