

SOUL IN THE SILO

Here's how Zynaty Living is dethroning the monopoly of sterile European imports with elevated Indian craftsmanship

There is a distinct, almost tangible moment when an interior ceases to be a mere accumulation of expensive square footage and instead begins to hum with the quiet, unmistakable frequency of home. It is an elusive alchemy that traditional, clinical design showrooms (with their aggressively lit, sterile kitchen vignettes and wardrobes hollowed out save for a singular, token silk garment) seldom manage to capture. Yet, walking through the threshold of Zynaty Living's newly minted flagship experience studio in the leafy design enclave of Chattarpur, Delhi, you are instantly struck by a radically different atmosphere, one carefully calibrated by its founder, Divya Singh, to feel less like a commercial transaction and more like an invitation into a highly sophisticated, lived-in sanctuary. Here, the air is thick with the aroma of freshly brewed traditional chai juxtaposed against the crisp effervescence of Perrier. A deliberate duality that mirrors Singh's own design philosophy, a seamless, high-low, East-meets-West convergence where global curation meets raw, uncompromising Indian utility.

At 42, Singh possesses the sharp, analytical precision of a seasoned corporate strategist combined with the deeply intuitive, spiritually guided world view of a classic creative storyteller. Her journey into the upper echelons of the ultra-luxury residential market did not begin
