

European modular systems that have long dominated Indian luxury real estate. For decades, high-net-worth homeowners blindly accepted the rigid, mathematical limitations imposed by Italian and German modular imports, which frequently top out at a standard 3,000 mm height. Recognising that the palatial farmhouses of Delhi demand a far grander, vertical scale, Singh defied conventional retail logic by establishing her own domestic production unit, effectively freeing her designs from restrictive global dimensions and exorbitant surcharges. The result is a spectacular triumph of local engineering. Bespoke wardrobes and soaring bar units that flush seamlessly to the highest ceilings, proving that Indian craftsmanship can easily out-design and out-manoeuvre its European counterparts when given the right visionary direction.

What truly elevates Zynaty from its contemporaries, however, is Singh's refusal to present design as an abstract concept. In her Chattarpur studio, every corner is meticulously staged to eliminate the exhausting guesswork so often required of clients. Instead of flat, soulless engineering displays, visitors are treated to spaces functioning in real-time. A custom bar is fully realised with the glittering geometry of Baccarat crystal and avant-garde vases sourced from Copenhagen, while open wardrobes are styled with actual curation, allowing patrons to visualise exactly how their own wardrobes will behave when filled with their personal collections. This immersive context carries over into her hyper-exclusive interior styling and art curation service, a passion project launched two years ago to remedy the clinical coldness that often plagues beautifully constructed properties.

For over a decade, Singh has operated entirely in the shadows of the ultra-luxury ecosystem. This new flagship store represents the beautiful culmination of that long, subterranean labour of love. It stands not merely as a marketplace for elite millwork and imported decor, but as a living, breathing testament to the idea that luxury is not defined by what you see when you walk into a room, but entirely by how it makes you feel.
