

The design carries immense pressure. When model Bella Hadid visited Jaipur Rugs' Dubai showroom, she famously bypassed standard event spaces to use Roar's stepwell design as her runway. Which is why everyone's expectation of the Mumbai store was sky high. "The fractal steps in Mumbai nod back to that iconic Dubai stepwell, but it's not a pastiche, traditional Jaipuri stepwell. It is a highly modern interpretation of that tiered, layered effect," she shares.

Discovering Good Design

Rejecting the standard, overwhelming layout of a traditional showroom, Roar structured the space as a fluid, non-linear labyrinth. "As architects, we tend to be narcissistic, we want to tell people exactly how to move," states Dean candidly. "I wanted someone to just meander. No two people will ever experience this space the same way." To completely eliminate the exhausting retail ritual of forcing four or five staff members to flip through heavy, horizontally stacked carpets, Dean borrowed a brilliant trick from large-format tile showrooms. Roar implemented a highly interactive vertical rug archive utilising massive, pull-out tiled storage systems. This allows interior designers and clients to easily slide out stock and see textiles in multiple formats without the cumbersome heavy lifting.

GEOMETRY IN MOTION
Pallavi Dean uses stepped, fractal geometry throughout the expansive space to ground the store's contemporary spatial language