

A LIVING LANDSCAPE

Perched on the urban fringe of Mumbai, this residence is an ecosystem where shifting metallic greens, mountain-sculpted forms and a chorus of exotic birds co-exist in perfect, calibrated harmony

When I first stood on the site of Roof for 37, I was struck by its incredible location. Perched right on Mumbai's urban edge, it sits where the concrete city finally loosens its grip and the verdant hills begin to assert their presence. The home is enveloped by a rare microclimate of shifting light, drifting clouds and green slopes that almost graze the windows. I knew immediately that the interior couldn't be a static box; it had to breathe, listen, and respond to this external landscape.

To achieve this, we wrapped the living room walls in a bespoke green metallic finish that acts as a climatic surface. Depending on how the sun hits it throughout the day, the walls gracefully modulate from a soft, sun-kissed olive to a deep, moody forest green. It absorbs and reflects light like the shaded underbelly of a monsoon cloud. At the centre of the room, a custom sculptural coffee table inspired by mountain foliage anchors the seating arrangement. To truly dissolve the boundary between the interior and the terrain outside, there isn't a conventional, clinical TV wall. Instead, a wildflower-inspired arched artwork that introduces a mythic meadowscape functions as a permanent visual portal to nature.

A Tale of Two Zones

Adjacent to the living room, we wanted to explore the concept of a visual diptych—two contrasting yet connected spaces held together by material continuity. The bar area leans into a restrained, retro-inflected glamour. Using green-washed surfaces and a rounded marble counter, we wanted to evoke a softened, indulgent 1980s nostalgia. The open shelves here serve as intimate galleries for the family's personal artefacts, anchoring the luxury in deep personal memory.

In direct contrast, the dining area asserts a quieter, more sculptural formality. The zone is anchored with an eight-seater marble-topped table resting on sleek brass legs. To bring a sense of organic history into the space, there's a carved white console that mimics fossilised forest matter. Reflective surfaces and strategically placed art installations extend the room's light and perspective. The two zones are allowed to have their own distinct identities, yet they converse seamlessly across the floor plan.

Cooking with Memory

For the kitchen, we step away from the sterile, hyper-minimalist aesthetics that dominate modern design. Instead, we chose a colour and material palette that subtly references the familiar domestic languages of historic Mumbai homes. By pairing soft pastel green cabinetry with a vibrant Moroccan blue backsplash, the space immediately feels alive. Beneath it all, a classic black-and-white inlay floor ties the look together. The result is a highly functional kitchen that feels both contemporary and remembered, visually restrained, yet rich in tactile comfort and nostalgic warmth.
