

Bedroom Shaped by Stillness

If this house is a symphony, the master bedroom acts as its ultimate crescendo. Here, architecture, light and ornament converge into a deeply sensorial, private retreat. The focal point is a custom-sculpted, mountain-inspired headboard that rises behind the bed as a bold topographic gesture. On the floor, the parquet woodwork captures incoming light in shifting, almost tidal patterns. Across the walls, painterly birds drift elegantly, echoing the physical aviary that sits just beyond the bedroom windows. To soften the scale of the room and introduce a warm, molten amber glow, we suspended a stingray-inspired luminaire above. Finally, blush mouldings and delicately tasselled drapery introduce a controlled sense of theatricality, perfectly balancing grand design with cosy intimacy.

Chaos Calibrated into Art

Designing a home is always a deeply personal process, but Roof for 37 presented an extraordinary, beautiful challenge. The home was conceived for a family whose life is shared with a remarkable constellation of companions—two daughters, two energetic huskies, a resident cat and a spectacular chorus of thirty exotic birds. It was clear from the start that this home had to function as a shared ecosystem rather than a rigid interior.

Despite the sheer abundance of life moving through the home, the design remains composed, measured
