Art of Slow Living

A Punjab-based studio is reviving the fine craft of traditional Indian joinery using old-growth sheesham

By Ridhi Kale

While the rest of the design world is busy churning out mass produced furniture meant to last until your next house move, Studio PALLAVI is asking us to do something different—wait. Founded by industrial designers Srishti and Pamaljeet, this Punjab-based powerhouse is subverting the slick, factory-made aesthetic of modern interiors with detailed and well designed pieces. We take a look at their debut collection, Holding Space.

Wood You?

The studio's story is an intense romance with raw timber. While working as design consultants, the founders stumbled upon massive, ancient sheesham trunks destined to be sliced into generic doors. "We realised that an enormous amount of wood gets wasted during that process," recall the founders. "These are trees that have already completed their lifespan, typically over 80-years-old." Instead of letting this history become scrap, they decided to do something about it. Operating between a design hub in Mohali and a gritty workshop in Muktsar, they let the wood dictate the rules. "Every tree has to go through its own round of design," they explain. "Nothing is really off the shelf because every tree is unique."

Lost Art, New Voice

If your aesthetic palate demands clinical, razor-sharp straight lines and predictable shapes, look away now. Holding Space rejects the sterile geometry of contemporary apartments,
