

WOODEN WONDERS
(previous page top to bottom) Top shot of Matsya and Avan along with front shot of Peedha; (current page) Meend, Peedha and Aks from the collection embracing instead the low-slung, fluid forms of older Indian ways of gathering. Plus, the manufacturing process celebrates ancient joinery. So, the studio uses absolutely no nails or screws, relying instead on smartly crafted joinery that depends on the natural properties of wood. Look closely at the structural details and you will spot a clever, softer reinterpretation of the traditional butterfly joint, loosely inspired by the endangered dolphin native to Punjab's Beas River.

Green by Design

While the rest of the design industry treats sustainability as a trendy marketing buzzword, Studio PALLAVI treats it like a binding contract. Their natural, chemical-free seasoning process takes up to three years. They finish their work exclusively with food-safe tung oil. "We do not greenwash sustainability," they state flatly. "Nothing can ever be 100 per cent sustainable. We're not claiming that. What we're committed to, however, is honesty. Our entire process is transparent."

Rural To Global

This fierce commitment to material honesty recently landed them at Copenhagen's prestigious 3 Days of Design festival, boldly bypassing the glitz of Milan Design Week. Not bad for a homegrown outfit where every single part of the supply chain operates within Punjab. Here, they found themselves courted by international architects, curators and multi-brand stores from New York to Seoul.

Their furniture is not meant to be replaced when the next trend hits. It is built to age, develop character and outlive its owners. In an industry obsessed with the new, Studio PALLAVI reminds us that true luxury is simply a piece that carries the weight of time, trees and tenderness.