The founding ethos of the National Law School of India University (NLSIU) was to pioneer legal education reforms and bring about a transformation of the Indian legal system. India's top law institute is testing two approaches to further that goal in the new academic year. One is the Clinics Project, which is designed to address the serious access to justice issues in five areas—juvenile justice, criminal justice, caste justice, labour justice and citizenship and immigration. At the same time it provides young law students with crucial experience of what litigation, advocacy and practice in these areas look like in the real world. Students will work with the
